would put the defendant on the stand and allow him to tell his story. Whan court convened the judicial chambers were filled with eager spectators and the story told by the Frenchman in his broken English was closely followed.

Before Borel took the stand two witnesses examined on Thursday were recalled, but nothing new or interesting was ellicited.

The frenchman's tale.

The frenchman's tale.

Then came the sensation. At his attorneys call, Borel stepped to the stand, took the oath and told the following story of his life and the main features in it, the loss of his life's savings and the killing of Lewis:

"My paging is known Rowell Lame."

He described the adjournment was taken Thomas Newey, a young man of Ogden, was arraigned for contempt of court, having, it is alleged made the remark while the jury was filing past, that if he was on the jury he would acquit Borel.
